KBq2

I am now going to ask how likely you would be to support two different local education policies:

First, suppose your local school district wants to assign children to schools in a way that ensures that children from a range of different income levels attend each school. In other words, the policy would create mixed-income public schools. Some children would attend the school closest to where they live, while others would not. Students in the public school system would be required to attend the school to which they are assigned.

How likely would you be to support this initiative?

<1> Not likely at all
<2> Somewhat likely
<3> Likely
<4> Very likely
<5> Extremely likely

KBq3

Second, suppose that your local school district wants to open one or more magnet schools. Magnet schools are choice-based public schools that do not draw from a specific geographic attendance area. Admissions decisions would be made, in part, based on family income to ensure that each magnet school enrolled children from a range of income levels. In other words, the policy would create mixed-income magnet schools. Enrollment in these schools would be strictly voluntary.

How likely would you be to support this initiative?

<1> Not likely at all
<2> Somewhat likely
<3> Likely
<4> Very likely
